Mr. Bill Phillips
Director of Administration
Bush/Quayle '92
1030 15th Street, N.W.
12th Floor
Washington, D. C. 20005

Dear Mr. Phillips:

I am writing this letter to you at the suggestion of David Bates. It concerns lining up the votes of the disability community for Bush/Quayle.

As you may know, a poll by Lou Harris showed at the time George Bush was elected President that about 2 million disabled voters had switched from the Democratic side to vote Republican. This was largely because disabled persons 1) believed that George Bush sincerely recognized their aspirations for mainstreaming and independence and 2) that he properly conveyed this message in the election process. Of especial importance was his mention of disability in his acceptance speech.

This switch in votes was achieved in part through an informal group of persons who worked with George Bush's staff to make sure the right message went out to the disability community. Included in this group were Evan Kemp, Justin Dart, Sandy Parrino, Judy Brotman, myself and from time to time others. On the White House side three persons played key roles: Boyden Gray; David Bates, who was always ready to give support and advice; and Bob Grady, who played a major role in placing the right message in candidate Bush's speeches. We worked without formal support and recognition from the top brass on the election committee that the disabled were an important target group in the election. In fact, the Committee gave the disabled community a small fraction of the attention that the Black community received even though the potential Republican vote of disabled Americans is considerably greater (there are 43 million disabled Americans, not to mention their families who are greatly influenced by the policies toward disabled people) than that of Blacks.

During the last three years the President's popularity with disabled Americans has held up because, among many other actions, he vigorously placed many disabled persons in his administration and he enthusiastically supported the ADA.

Although the President now has an edge with the disabled community, the democratic candidates can be counted on to woo this community. Senator Harkin, for example, pushes himself as the person who brought ADA into being. It will be necessary when democratic candidates challenge the President on disability matters that the plans of Democrats are known and that the correct response goes out quickly. This means the Bush re-election committee must take seriously the importance of the disability community as a voting group.

All the above leads us to a request that the disability vote has formal recognition on the Bush/Quayle '92 team and support from top leaders. The purpose of course is to make sure that the President holds and increases the loyalty of this very large block of voters. Seeking the support of the disability community is a no lose situation.

I would like to meet with you to discuss this whole matter further. I will call you in a few days.

Sincerely,

Osborne A. Day

COMMENTS:

Dear Doro:

David Bates says this letter should get us to Teeter, Malik or Mosbacher. I don't want to bother your father with our efforts but he should know there is a large group in town ready to help with the disability vote.

Please tell you father that I would like to borrow his grandchildren.

Mr. Sam Skinner
Chief of Staff
The White House
Washington, DC 20500

Dear Mr. Skinner:

Thanks for taking time to visit at our Heritage Foundation board meeting. It was useful.

For your file, here are the views I, for one, shared...in reverse order, punch-line first:

1. George Bush must go to the people with a clear message of, "I accepted bad advice in August 1990 and made a mistake when I repudiated my 'no new taxes' position. I will take steps to correct that including replacing those who gave that advice." Then he must replace Mr. Darman and Mr. Brady.
2. Until the President takes such action, "Read my lips" lingers mocked as, "read my hips"...a feint this way, then that way, etc. Until this is done, his credibility will continue to decline; and what you feel is being presented as policy simply will be tuned out by the public and/or not believed. For now, many folks are tuning out. Later, disbelief.
3. Those at the White House or on the campaign staff who even hint they still believe Pat Buchanan is the issue or the problem should be offered early retirement. Significant portions of those staffs (and perhaps the President himself) are not getting the point of public anger which could turn into outrage.
4. In politics perception is reality, as you know. It is clear that the growing perception (not total) west of the Alleghenies is: Bush administration policy moves are mostly knee-jerk tactics and its operational process is, as the WSJ put it, "rudderless conciliation."

"Take on the Congress" is the message being sent to you. But, as I am told, a significant portion of the White House staff feels that the Presidency taking on the Congress is a sign of weakness.

5. The Bush administration has failed to control the framing of any issue except for Kuwait/Iraq and, indirectly, the Clarence Thomas nomination. If you don't frame the issue, you cannot control the debates. For example, it is incredible that runaway spending by Congress has been totally obscured by allowing the framing of the issue to become: "tax fairness."
6. I'm told that opinion research by the Democrats (recently) shows that a large segment of voters under 30 perceives George Bush to be similar to Jimmy Carter, i.e., indecisive, not really knowing where he's going. I'm 60 and, since the palace policy coup of August 1990, I also believe the administration is adrift.

I should tell you that this board meeting today is the first 'extraordinary' one we've held...and I've been here from day one. At our regular board meeting last December we scheduled an extraordinary session for two days following the New Hampshire primary... because we (100%) were angry and certain the Bush NH campaign would be a disaster. We had no thought of your being here and we thank you for coming.

7. I'd like to try to explain what I believe people mean when they say, "George Bush is running against George Bush" (WSJ, 2/20). I'm reading from my own notes (standing)...not prepared by someone else...out of respect for your time.

I'm a bit chagrined that WSJ, 2/20, editorialized along nearly identical lines. My remarks were prepared 2/19...though I did pick up a useful quote and introduction.

Please believe that what you heard last Friday at Heritage was unrehearsed and from the hearts and minds of people who care. We are not just "another special interest group."

If I can be of any further use in this regard, just let me know.

Very truly yours,

J. F. Rench
Chairman

P.S. A personal note: I was surprised, elated and impressed with George Bush's focus, resolve and leadership in the Iraq/Kuwait affair...particularly following the August 1990 debacle which I found frightening, i.e., beyond outrage. Thus, his silent performance since February 1991 becomes even more juxtaposed and curious. Even as I write this, I know Mr. Bush has not been "silent." So that cannot be the right word, yet that's what I feel. Perhaps the word/idea is "unfocused."

SHOW
POTUS

The overwhelming majority of Americans continue to be very concerned about the drug issue. They see it as negatively impacting all of the social problems they are concerned about, including their concerns about the economy.

They are virtually unanimous that the President should be very involved on several fronts: from providing leadership to allocating more money for treatment.

However, while they recognize the president spoke to the country on the drug issue, most people believe he is now only a little involved in the problem if at all.

(Furthermore, 81% of Americans feel this is a non-partisan issue that cannot be solved by either party alone. This is true regardless of which party affiliation the respondent belonged to.)
